Eight years ago, Dr. Sheilah Lynch knew DC was the place to establish her plastic surgery practice. Her medical training odyssey ended with a fellowship in Breast and Aesthetic surgery at the prestigious Georgetown University Medical Center in Washington. After her Plastic Surgery residency in the subdued New England enclave at Brown University, which included training stints in Boston, high-flying Miami, Adelaide, Australia and mixed with volunteer medical missions to Kenya and the Dominican Republic; she decided DC was the place!

DC offered an eclectic mix of international flair, anchored by Embassy Row, a high concentration of media, academia, and the arts, in addition to being the obvious center for politics and power. "Washington is an image town with a sophisticated twist," says Dr. Lynch. "What presents the challenge to succeed here is a steady stream of savvy, well-educated patients, versed in fitness and nutrition, and the latest trends in liposuction, tummy tucks, breast surgery and minimal incision facelifts."

Dr. Lynch's thriving practice in Chevy Chase may be summed up in the answer to the question in her patient intake form: How were you referred to our office? 'Former patient' is now the most common and gratifying answer to Dr. Lynch. "At the end of the day my surgery and the resulting patient satisfaction is what matters most."

In response to a high demand for ancillary skin care treatments, permanent make-up and low-downtime peels, Dr. Lynch has added an on-site, private salon. She is currently designing a second office location in Easton/St. Michaels where she spends her free time boating with her husband Tom Hogan, and daughters Mary Kate and Elle Grace.
